“... the twentieth century, it was increasingly clear, was the century of the common people, and dominated by the arts produced by and for them. And two linked instruments made the world of the common man visible as never before and capable of documentation: reportage and the camera. Neither was new but both entered a self-conscious golden age after 1915. Writers, ... not only saw themselves as recorders or reporters, but wrote for newspapers and indeed were or had been newspapermen. ‘Reportage’ ... became an accepted genre of socially-critical literature and visual representation in the 1920s...” Eric Hobsbawm, Age of Extremes, p. 192

From the above paragraph, which of the following statements is FALSE

- a. the twentieth century was dominated by arts produced by and for the common people
- b. reportage and the camera were important devices through which the common people were seen and heard
- c. the idea of the ‘common people’ was not prevalent prior to the twentieth century
- d. The twentieth century was a golden age for the camera.

At least since the mid-nineteenth century, liberal theorists have tended, though by no means universally, to champion the claims of minority groups, and have respected religious bodies as entitled to the same toleration as other groups, so long as they did not threaten social peace and order.

According to the author, liberal theorists have tended to agree that:

- i. Minority groups that do not threaten social peace were to be tolerated
- ii. Religion propagates, peace and social harmony
- iii. Religious bodies were minority groups
- iv. Minority groups do not often threaten social peace

Ans

Any historical understanding of British science in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries must contradict any attempts to draw essential distinctions between global and local knowledge. Local knowledge from the peripheries of empire were constitutive of both the form and content of science at the metropolitan center. The following statement indicates that,

- i. Science developed within the boundaries of metropolitan Europe
- ii. Global and local knowledge are essentially different in form and content
- iii. Interactions between Europe and non-European societies shaped the emergence of western science
- iv. Science is global and Universal

Europe's ambivalent conquests—oscillating between attempts to project outward its own ways of understanding the world and efforts to demarcate colonizer from colonized, civilized from primitive, core from periphery—made the space of empire into a terrain where concepts were not only imposed but also engaged and contested.

From the above statement one can infer that:

- i. European intervention was resisted in the colonies
- ii. The colony was an intense ideological landscape where ideas were negotiated and challenged
- iii. Different ways of identifying and demarcating the coloniser from the colonised was essential for the colonial rule
- iv. Europe's conquest of the non-European was ambivalent and complex.

Modernity as it emerged in Europe has various distinct aspects: the rise of a capitalist industrial economy, the growth of modern state institutions and resultant transformations in the nature of social power, the emergence of democracy, the decline of the community and the rise of strong individualistic social conduct, the decline of religion and the secularization of ethics. One of the major streams of thought that emerged in early twentieth century India was that despite India's cultural and religious diversity, if it wanted to be a modern nation-state it must start to acknowledge the primacy of a single culture based on a majority religion and language.

According to the author,

- i. Modernity in India was a replica of European renaissance
- ii. Religion was a uniting factor in the emergence of the nation-states across cultures and societies
- iii. Language is the unifying factor in birth of nation-states
- iv. Approaches to modernisation were different in different contexts

In England, it was the sub-categories of the working class – the ‘undeserving poor’, ‘vagabonds’, ‘dangerous classes’, and the ‘residuum’ – that tended to be compared to the empire’s indigenous peoples: groups that were deemed a threat not only to the wealthy and privileged but to the moral health of the rest of the working population.

According to the author,

- i. Moral health of the working population was a source of great concern for Britain.
- ii. Communities that were not settled were considered as a threat to the state
- iii. In England, there was an elaborately drawn out method for defining sub-categories of the working class
- iv. The wealthy and the privileged considered the vagabonds as a threat to their moral health

'Such coexistence of class solidarity and other affinities, as witnessed in the Tebhaga and Telangana struggles, was of course still more explicit in the politically less sophisticated agrarian uprisings of the period before 1900. The dye of a traditional culture was yet to wash off the peasant's consciousness, and its articulation in insurgent violence, directed as it was against the very foundations of that culture, was bound to generate some ambiguity. Many of these earlier instances, therefore of what essentially was the peasants' resistance to their class enemies, lend themselves to misinterpretation as nothing but communal or racial protest...' (Ranajit Guha, Elementary Aspects of Peasant Insurgency, p. 170)

In this statement, Guha is suggesting that :

- a. Peasant protests before 1900 were invariably traditional and non-violent
- b. It is difficult to disentangle the solidarities based on class interest from those based on racial or ethnic interest
- c. Class interests did not form any part of pre-1900 protests

Memory is not a passive depository of facts, but an active process of creation of meanings. Thus, the specific utility of oral sources for the historian lies, not so much in their ability to preserve the past, as in the very changes wrought by memory. (Alessandro Portelli, The Death of Luigi Trastulli and Other Stories, p. 52)

What does Alessandro Portelli imply when he says, "Memory is not a passive depository of facts, but an active process of creation of meanings"?

- a. Memory is not a store-house where one can search around and find a ready-formed story
- b. Memories are not pure, but are contingent

Prime Minister Winston Churchill commented in a memo on March 10, 1943, at the height of the Bengal Famine

“I am glad to learn from the Minister of War Transport that a strict line is being taken in dealing with requests for cereals from the Indian Ocean area. A concession to one country at once encourages demands from all the others...They must learn to look after themselves as we have done. The grave situation of the UK import programme imperils the whole war effort and we cannot afford to send ships merely as a gesture of good will.”

By this, we understand that:

- i. Churchill saw the war effort as more important than humanitarian concerns.
- ii. Churchill was an efficient manager of competing demands from the Indian Ocean area
- iii. The Bengal Famine was a man-made and not a natural disaster
- iv. Bengali and British suffering during wartime had to be equal.

Answer:

- a. i and iii
- b. ii and iii
- c. iii and iv
- d. i and iv

“Traditions of classical music were preserved in the early decades of colonial rule in more or less traditional ways: princely zamindari patronage, and gharanas or lineages of gurus or ustads and pupils segregated from each other, jealous of secrets of their craft and demanding lifelong dedication. This was both a highly fragmented world, and one set apart, on the whole, from that of the new, somewhat westernized, middle class.” Sumit Sarkar, Modern Times, 2014

Which statement below best describes what the author means in the passage above:

- a. That there was a disjuncture between the traditional classical world and the westernized class
- b. The zamindars patronized the gurus of the gharanas
- c. The westernized class did not listen to traditional Indian classical music
- d. Ustads and pupils were generally segregated from each other.
