Linda Hutcheon, argues that the primary connection between postmodernism and feminism is their problematization of the body and its sexuality.

- a. If, in the postmodern age, we do live in what has been called a recessionary erotic economy brought about by fear of disease and a fetishisation of fitness, the erotic cannot but be part of that general problematising of the body and its sexuality.

- b.both problematize representation and conventions, desire and subjectivity, are points of convergence.

- c. However, in spite of their commonalities the two cannot be conflated, because postmodernism has a duplicitous politics which can be appropriated by both the left and the right, while feminism has a straightforwardly anti-normative politics.
