Read the passage and answer the questions below

The foundation of religious beliefs and faiths is laid down in man along with socialization. The child on account of his natural instinct of imitation develops religious beliefs from his parents or some member of his family. On the basis of this imitation the subject and nature of his religious beliefs are determined. The foundation of religious beliefs laid by parents and members of family is strengthened by religious institutions and preaching. It is not reasonable to confine religion within the religious rituals originating from religious beliefs. There are many who do not perform religious rituals but are religious. They lay emphasis on the achievement of humanitarian ideals. In fact, the real religion is one which provides strength and inspiration in every situation arising in a man's life. The laws of religion determined along with this religious conviction have their impact on activities in one's life. The development of religious faith is very difficult in the absence of a favourable social environment. Reasoning, thinking and contemplation have proved to be very strong factors in strengthening religious faiths. Reasoning helps propagation and affords protection to religious beliefs.

Read the passage and answer the questions below

The French Sociologist Gustavo Le Bon (1895) devoted a whole book to study the nature of crowds; he described how the people in a crowd often think, feel and act in extreme ways like mob scenes, crowd hysteria and how they accept or reject ideas uncritically. He contrasted the behaviour of people when they are alone with their behaviour when they are members of large groups. Floyd Allport (1924) described a crowd as "a collection of individuals who are all attending and reacting to some common object, their reactions being of a simple proponent sort and accompanied by strong emotional responses." Crowds and audiences are temporary collection of human beings, in contrast to groups which are more enduring. While groups have a hierarchic structure, there is no such structure in crowds and audiences. Though they are temporary and though they are without structure, crowds and audiences are of great significance in social life. The crowd is the most transitory and unstable of all social groups. It is an unorganized group. Crowds form quickly and also dissolve quickly as we can see in the market place. The crowds differs from the audience in that the participants in an assembly, public meeting or cinema house fall into the predetermined order and are arranged according to some principle of selection; but in a crowd there is no such order whatever.
