56) Vissarion Belinsky (1811-48) was the leading literary critics in the Russia of the 1830s and 1840s. His work chiefly took the form of literary criticism, which became a major vehicle for the discussion of social and even political problems in Russia - although those who were critical of the regime were nonetheless compelled to tread carefully. Belinsky emerged as one of the most important figures in these discussion. As one historian has written, "It is no exaggeration to say that Belinsky's dramatic intellectual evolution influenced the outlook of an entire generation." The following letter was written in response to the writer Nikolai Gogol'. With the publication of The Inspector General (1836) and Dead Souls (1842), Gogol' was acclaimed by the regime's critics as a truthful painter of Russian life and a forceful critic of the evils of serfdom and bureaucratic corruption. But Gogol's actual convictions turned out to be rather different, as was revealed in Gogol's Selected Passages from a Correspondence with Friends (1847). Here Gogol' declared that Russia's ills were a consequence not of the political or social system but rather the moral failings of individuals. Gogol' advocated a kind of national regeneration through complete submission to the Church and the paternal guidance of the autocratic. Intellectuals of the 1840s saw this as an apology for what they saw as the tyranny of Nicholas I (1825-55). Belinsky's was the most outraged and famous reaction to Gogol's Selected Passages. His letter stands, to quote another historian, as "a landmark in Russian intellectual history," that "explicitly stated the Westernizing intelligentsia's belief in the interconnection of material, political, and spiritual progress in the tradition of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment.

“You’ve a nice house, Joseph,” I could not refrain from observing, “and pleasant inmates; and I think the concentrated essence of all the madness in the world took up its abode in my brain the day I linked my fate with theirs! However, that is not to the present purpose—there are other rooms. For heaven’s sake be quick, and let me settle somewhere!”

He made no reply to this adjuration; only plodding doggedly down the wooden steps, and halting, before an apartment which, from that halt and the superior quality of its furniture, I conjectured to be the best one. There was a carpet—a good one, but the pattern was obliterated by dust; a fireplace hung with cut-paper, dropping to pieces; a handsome oak bedstead with ample crimson curtains of rather expensive material and modern make; but they had evidently experienced rough usage: the valances hung in festoons, wrenched from their rings, and the iron rod supporting them was bent in an arc on one side, causing the drapery to trail upon the floor. The chairs were also damaged, many of them severely; and deep indentations deformed the panels of the walls. I was endeavouring to gather resolution for entering and taking possession, when my fool of a guide announced,—“This here is t’ maister’s.” My supper by this time was cold, my appetite gone, and my patience exhausted. I insisted on being provided instantly with a place of refuge, and means of repose.
