Barbara Tedlock's article, "Works and Wives: On the Sexual Division of Textual Labor" (1995), gives a historical and intellectual genealogy of what the author argues is a division of ethnographic labor between men and women. She says that women's writing within ethnography has historically been undervalued. In this context, which of the following statement is correct?

1. The popular opinion in academia is that women (wives) write "experimental" or "reflexive" ethnographies which are considered non-professional narratives.
2. Men (husbands) write ethnographies that are accepted in the academy because they are proper academicians.
3. Women's writing within ethnography has historically been lauded and more appreciated across the sciences and the arts.
4. Male-authored ethnographies have been largely dismissed because of both their form and their content.

Excerpt from "Women, Hunger and Famine: Bengal, 1350/ 1943." (2005)

The centrality of female suffering was also notably emphasized in the visual iconography of the famine. The sketches (brush drawings in black ink on paper) of Zainul Abedin, then lecturer at the Government College of Art in Calcutta and one of the pioneers of modernism in Bengali art, were perhaps pre-eminent among them. They appeared in the daily Swadhinata as well as in other newspapers and periodicals from Calcutta; eleven of them were reproduced in Ela Sen's Darkening Days (1944), a set of short stories about the famine. Abedin's sketches, marked by economy, a certain confidence of stroke, and an unusual lack of sentimentality, combine the conventions of Bengali folk art with those of European Expressionism. They tend to showcase skeletal mothers and children in urban landscapes begging for food, sitting or lying-in despair besides an empty plate, or reduced to scavenging for scraps with dogs and crows. Often the dustbin that forms the backdrop of this destitution is represented as high and forbidding, like a fortress; the ubiquitous crows, often as large as the children by whom they are poised, are well fed and aggressive. It is always not clear whether they are competitors with humans for food or they feast directly on human flesh; Nikhil Sarkar has suggested that they represent the black marketeers for whom the famine was an extremely profitable experience. Abedin's compatriots such as Palkrishna Pal and Sunilmadhab Sen also favour maternal subjects, though and self-consciously uplifting their figures are far more monumental than Abedin's; they serve less as direct representations of female suffering than as memorial to cult of motherhood made popular by the events of 1350/1943.

The passage suggests that:

1. Representations of women as images of plenitude, were circulated through the popular press.
2. Black ink sketches were the preferred medium of choice for visualizing female suffering during the Bengal famine
3. The main role of artists in the 1940s was colonial propaganda
4. The Government College of Art in Calcutta promoted women artists

The passage reveals that shift in visual scale of the dustbin:

1. Worked as a symbolic device to depict the difficulty of access to food
2. Helped to connect the negative and positive areas of the drawing
3. Helped to establish a maternal presence
4. Worked to give the look of "Bengali folk art"
