Two recent Indian Supreme Court decisions pertaining to the de-criminalisation of same sex relations (Navtej Singh Johar v. Union of India) and for the right of menstruating women to enter the Sabarimala Temple in Kerala (Indian Young Lawyers Association v. Union of India) deals with the genealogy of legal reasoning. While Johar dealt with constitutionality of a statute (section 377 of the Indian Penal Code of 1860, inherited from colonial era) which criminalised 'carnal intercourse against the order of nature' and consistently interpreted to refer to sexual intercourse between persons of the same sex; Sabarimala dealt with the constitutionality of a statutory instrument (rule 3(b) of the Kerala Hindu Places of Public Worship (Authorisation of Entry) rules of 1965) which itself refers to a centuries old custom prohibiting the entry to the Sabarimala Temple to women between ten and fifty years old, thus adding a religious dimension to the case. Which of the following statement/s is/are true with respect to the two cases?

- a. Johar resulted in a unanimous verdict ruling against the constitutionality of section 377
- b. Sabarimala while ruling against rule 3(b) gave rise to a dissenting opinion.
- c. Both the cases were decided by the same bench of Justice Dhananjaya Y. Chandrachud and Justice Indu Malhotra.
- d. Irrespective of their radically different subject matter, ruled upon the same constitutional grounds: namely the fundamental rights to equality (article 14), against discrimination (article 15) and to life (article 21).
- e. The dissenting opinion on the Sabarimala came from Justice Indu Malhotra.

Sl. No.97

QBID:8842097

Please read the passage and answer the question that follows:

Oskar Lange: General Problems: Political Economy (pp.77-78)

Spontaneity in operation of economic laws

Economic laws are objective phenomena; their existence and operation is independent of human will and consciousness. But economic laws may operate in a way which coincides with man's conscious aims and the activities intended to achieve those aims, or they may not. In the first case we say that economic laws operate in a way intended by man, and in the second case, that they operate spontaneously. The majority of economic laws in all the social formations preceding the emergence of the socialist formation have worked spontaneously.

It is true that even in pre-socialist formations certain economic laws may operate in a way intended by man, but they are not laws which determine the development of the social formation. In most cases they are laws of the economic influence of super structure, especially of the state, or certain technical and balance laws of production. The specific economic laws which result from the relations of production, in particular the basic economic law of a social formation, and those laws which express features common to the relations of production in more than one social formation, do not operate in conformity with man's aims. The spontaneity of their operation is partly due to the fact that economic stimuli and the ways of reacting to them—in ways that are unintended and in most cases unconscious—arise from the historic arrangement of the relations of production and the corresponding relations of distribution, partly because the various stimuli are at variance with each other, and partly because a complex of human actions gives a combined result which was not intended by any of the persons or human groups involved. We again quote Engels: "That which is willed happens but rarely; in the majority of instances the numerous desired ends cross and conflict with one another, or these ends themselves are from the outset incapable of realization, or the means of attaining them are insufficient". Thus, the mode of operation of the pre-socialist formation and the dialectical process of development— "the economic law of motion", as Marx called it, are spontaneous. The birth, development and decline of social formations is a spontaneous process.

Fetishization of economic laws

The spontaneity of this process accounts for the fact that it develops like a process of natural history even though it is the result of conscious and purposive human actions. As Engels goes on to say in the passage from which we have already quoted: "... the conflicts of innumerable individual wills and individual actions in the domain of history produce a state of affairs entirely analogous to that prevailing in the realm of unconscious nature". In the same sense Marx, writing about the development of capitalism, stated that "my standpoint" is one "from which the evolution of the economic formation of society is viewed as a process of natural history".

This "natural history" type of process is in fact the result of human actions. Each of these actions taken separately is conscious and purposive, but the conditions independent of human will in which these actions take place, as also the interplay of those actions, make their social outcome a spontaneous process.

According to Oskar Lange economic laws operate spontaneously because:

1. They are structural features for all social formations.
2. They operate independently of human will and actions.
3. Because they do not have any human interference.
4. They are social phenomenon

Quoting Engels and Marx, the author believes that spontaneity in the 'economic laws of motions' results in rise and fall of all social formations because:

1. Of the progress of natural evolution.
2. Of overpopulation.
3. Because of the development of contradictions.
4. Because of the result of human actions
