Read the passage carefully and answer the question that follow :

Post-industrial society has as its defining logic the idea of work. Progress is determined in terms of GDP and GNP and the primary determinant for gauging the contribution of individuals, institutions and organisations towards society is the output obtaining of the work they do within it. If we accept this logic, it might apropos be entertaining to consider the following preposition: Do politicians in our country work? And if they do not, how can they understand, let alone give direction to, the dynamics of "work" that shapes, as it were, the "destiny" of the nation.

Politics draws its players from all walks of life. Lawyers, doctors, policemen, Ex-armymen, etc fill its ranks, not to mention the odd industrialist or performing artist. Most politicians however, are "loyal subjects" of one political party or the other. These worthies have built their political base since their college days. At the village level, their maturing years might just as well have seen them donning the role of henchmen for the dominant order or group in their community. So whereas among our present crop of politicians many have worked in the past, as farmers, lawyers and artists, many more have not at all! The latter have been psychologically nurtured by a system of reference that is at variance with us commoners, who have to get about our lives with a certain sense of inevitability : if no effort, then no success, resulting from which no money and therefore... just penury and the care of exacting circumstances.

These career politicians have never had to relate efforts to its correlative — award. They have garnered welfare for themselves like privileged overlords, mandated with the right, as it were, to run the first rake across a field ripe with the effort of those who actually till and nurture the produce that garners the nation's wealth.

The only craft that these politicians learn is the art and idiom of political communication. They can twist and shake their wobbly heads with the aplomb of a consummate stage artist, mesmerising the gullible into believing they are not men (and women) of straw; that a mere poke at their corpulent belly will not actually dissipate them into nothingness. The very nature of their socialisation undoes their ability to conceive, at the felt level of reference, of what actually entails work, and the value of the sum total of effort that common people put in to make the wheels of the nation turn.

We therefore have this class of people, a vast majority of whom has, at best, a rather philosophical notion of work ("we must work with dedication to get the country ahead"). And these very people are empowered to provide direction to people actually engaged in work. They lay down rules, create conditions and establish principles for almost all productive work in society. They also determine who shall work where and how many of which group can gain privileged entry into earmarked jobs, usually in the keep of this group.

Those who speak for a greater role for politicians (thus the state) in the governance of the country do not really care about the real "workers" in society. How can people who have never done a spot of honest work (pun intended) realise what work entails? Can they hear the beat of the hammer as it fashions an artefact shaped by the muscled strength of a toiling hand? Most importantly. can they even empathise living as they do in their ivory towers? The preposition holds regardless of whether they are born with silver or wooden spoons. Unless we ban career politicians and welcome those who have done honest work before taking up a political career, we will, as a nation, merely keep running to stay in the same place.
